

are not permitted, and even foot traffic is not welcome when the trains are running. No train "Dicks" walk the rails, nor do station masters have time to police the miles of track that extend from home yard to back yard.

Railroads are not fun to play on. Balancing on rails becomes tiresome. Tie walking is never even paced. Gravel and rocks are always ankle bending. Where, then, is the pleasure of walking the rails? It must be in the mind, for there is no physical joy. It's the mind that compacts the experiences of the railroad ages into a capsule just large enough to swallow with a cupful of nostalgia. It's the mind that rehearses history and dreams and associates them with the hardness of steel, the earthiness of rock, and the wooden memory of life--all combined in a road that takes man where he hasn't been but wants to be. You've now traveled the iron horse's tracks from rail head to canyon head, and somehow you're satisfied in a special way for doing it.
